

Contents

Introduction	7
1. Migration as a well-known and longstanding phenomenon is something different from the current large-scale influx of migrants into Europe	11
2. Differentiating between individual migration and mass migration, and between immigrants and asylum seekers, is the key to understanding the problem.	19
3. Non-European aspects of the European migration crisis.	29
4. The massive move of migrants is a European problem, both in its causes and consequences; it is not a problem of the Middle East or North Africa	37
5. Mass migration has been initiated by European elites as part of their project to build a new Europe	45

6. Does Europe need migrants from different worlds? Does Europe need any migrants at all?	53
7. Let us compare the costs and risks of mass migration to the empty rhetoric of European elites	63
8. Mass migration as a very convenient pretext for further EU centralisation	69
Conclusion	75