Figures

2.1	The theory of religious-secular competition	25
2.2	Schematic representation of the time change of religious-secular competition	42
3.1	Four types (highest level)	53
3.2	Nine subtypes: aggregates and milieus (lowest level)	53
4.1	The four types distinguish themselves according to whether they describe themselves as 'religious' and/or 'spiritual'	70
4.7	The types distance themselves from different negative groups	73
5.1	The types and subtypes	78
6.1	The institutional type sees religious faith as a value and has more conservative norms regarding sexuality and gender than the other types	99
6.2	Older people have clearly more conservative norms regarding sexuality and gender roles than younger people	106
7.1	Major churches, Evangelical churches and alternative-spiritual suppliers are each anchored in their own milieu	112
7.2	Most members of Evangelical churches belong to the institutional type; among Catholics and the Reformed, the institutional type is very much in the minority	113
7.3	Among the alternative, distanced and secular types, churches are primarily important for others	115
7.4	With the exception of the institutional type, people have less trust in the church than they do in other institutions	122
8.1	In all four types a relativistic position predominates regarding whether there are 'basic truths' in many religions	130
8.2	Christians and Buddhists attract the most easy and quite positive attitudes	137
8.3	Muslims attract the most very and quite negative attitudes	137
8.4	Different subtypes have very different attitudes towards foreign religions	149
9.1	An overview of the seven hypotheses	152
9.2	There was an economic boom in Switzerland between 1946 and 1973	153
9.3	Religious affiliation in Switzerland: the number of people with no religious affiliation has increased rapidly since 1960	155
