

Table of Contents

	Pages
Note on Authors	vii
Foreword of the Authors	ix
Executive Summary: Interpretation of the Results of the Study and Proposals for Further Work	xi
1. Introduction	1
1.1 Background of the survey	1
1.2 Introduction: Is the era of centralisation over?	1
1.3 Aim and focus of the survey	4
1.4 The importance of context	6
1.5 Methodology	12
2. Public Administration Modernisation in Europe: Similar or Different Trajectories?	15
2.1 Economic situation and budgetary pressures as main drivers	15
2.2 Different paths and patterns of public administration modernisation	18
2.3 Public administration modernisation and its relevance for the Lisbon Strategy	27
3. Decentralisation and Centralisation of HRM	33
3.1 Advantages and disadvantages of centralisation and decentralisation – Why is this issue relevant?	33
3.2 Is there a “new” decentralised model superseding the “old” hierarchical bureaucracy?	36
3.3 Disentangling different types of HR decentralisation	48

3.4	Vertical centralisation and decentralisation of HRM – comparative observations	51
3.5	Which HR issues are more centralised and which are more decentralised?	58
3.6	The horizontal distribution of HR responsibilities and competencies – The role of central HR units	63
3.7	The responsibilities of line ministers and top administrative level	70
3.8.	The devolution of tasks to line/agency managers and lower hierarchical levels	73
3.9	The role of the trade unions and staff representations in HR issues	75
3.10	Decentralisation of managing and controlling agencies	77
4.	Accountability: A Central Concern of Public Administration Modernisation with Many Faces	83
4.1	Accountability trends in the EU: Performance and external accountability on the rise	85
4.2	Decentralisation and accountability: Alignment of reform concepts?	86
4.3	A broad spectrum of tools and reform initiatives to strengthen accountability and secure policy coherence	89
5.	Summary and Main Consequences for HRM	101
	References	109
	ANNEX: Survey during the Austrian Presidency of the EU–EPAN Human Resources Working Group	113